Home exam questions

Choose one of the two following questions, and submit your paper underneath:

1) Global violent jihadism has increased during the past decades. What are the main ideological issues that many groups share and how would you explain their recruitment and growth?

OR:

2) Describe some main approaches in female terrorism research. Discuss the relevance of these approaches for understanding women in radical religious movements in South-Asia and the Islamic State.

Guildelines for the take home exam

The assessment for SOS2700 - Religious fundamentalism, extremism and violence consists of a 3-day home exam. The evaluation of the assignment will constitute the final grade for the course.

In the evaluation of the assignment, importance is placed upon the following points:

- All parts of the assignment have been answered.
- The candidate describes clearly their understanding of the question and its limits.
- The assignment demonstrates the candidate's ability to present both theory and empirical material.
- The assignment makes use of relevant parts of the syllabus literature (some literature not on the syllabus may be used sparingly).
- The assignment sets out interesting points of discussion and proceeds from these points.

To pass the assignment the candidate must show sociological understanding of the topics the course covers; be able to discuss theories, concepts and empirical knowledge; and be able to connect concepts to each other and to the material being discussed.

Practical information about the examination

The exam is published in Inspera at 10:00 am on the first day of the exam. You submit your exam paper in Inspera before 2:00 pm on the last day of the exam. Inspera closes the examination automatically at precisely 2 pm, so in practice you must have uploaded your file by 1:59 pm.

How to use references

When writing your assignment/thesis, you are required to site the sources that you use. This includes books and articles, but also newspapers, internet sources, TV-shows, lectures, public documents, leaflets etc.

Referencing a source is necessary when you site a source directly, but also when you build upon an argument without a direct citation – if the idea or argument is not your own, you must reference where you got the idea from.

When you use references in your text you include author, year and page if you quote passages of text, e.g. (Birrell 1972:14). If you refere to ideas that are presented, without quotations, you include author and year in the reference, e.g. (Birrell 1972)
